Our telegram today show that a very serious situation may be created by France's breach of neutrality. The position of the benevolent neutral is always one of much delicacy and difficulty, and we can well understand the anxiety of the French not to incur against their ally the provisions of International Law more stringently than they are absolutely compelled. It is, however, clear that in this war the French have gone much further in the way of assisting the Russian Fleet than the equity of nations justify or even permit. It is useless for French papers to argue, as for instance, the "Temps" does, that French neutrality has been strictly maintained, when all the world can see that the twenty-four hour limit has never once been enforced against the ships of the Baltic Fleet, and that Rodjestyak has been allowed to coal with out the hindrance of French ports. To allow the warship of a belligerent to take on board so much coal as will enable her to reach the nearest of her own ports is a rule sanctioned by the consent of all nations, but the Russian Fleet has made no pretence of the way in which France has interpreted her duties as a neutral. She has allowed her ports to be used as bases for the Russian Fleet, and she would have no ground for resentment if the Japanese frankly accepted a situation which is now of their own making. Rodjestyak to action within her territorial waters. France cannot justly claim that her
